Heartlands: A Portrait of Derby and the East Midlands on film

Come to the BFI Mediatheque @ QUAD in the heart of Derby and explore 100 films and TV programmes about Derby and the East Midlands – for FREE

Drawn from the BFI National Archive and the Media Archive for Central England, Heartlands is a landmark collection of films and TV programmes reflecting over 100 years of life in Derby and the wider region.

You can enjoy the beautiful colour film of Derby's Charter Celebrations (1954) and witness shocking slum housing in Homes for the People (1945). Relish the presentation of Britain's first diesel locomotive in Main Line Diesel (1946) and a 1968 interview with Derby County FC's Brian Clough. Join day-trippers for a paddle in the sea in We Chose Skegness (1962) or take a colourful hike in the Peak District (1954).

More recent depictions of the region include the first ever episodes of Peak Practice (1993) and the grotesquely inventive The League of Gentlemen (1999). You'll also find iconic feature films, including Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (1960), starring Albert Finney as a disaffected Nottingham factory worker, and the unsettling Dead Man's Shoes (2004), Shane Meadows' masterly revenge thriller, set in rural Derbyshire.

The Heartlands collection is a collaboration between the BFI National Archive and the Media Archive for Central England. It has been generously supported by EM Media, the Regional Screen Agency for England's East Midlands, through the National Lottery Regional Investment Fund for England.
